Abstract:	This paper proposes a joint application of online network analysis and NLP techniques to explore dynamics of 'polarized intersectionality' - i.e., how (mis)representations of women that develop online and at the intersection of different axes of discrimination entwine with ideological and affective polarization. We look in particular at whether and how digital (mi)representations change together with political scenarios in which political parties, leaders and partisan communities more in general swing from collaboration to hostility. Our analysis of two Twitter conversations that put women at the centre of attention show that changing political scenarios generate different digital conversations that reflect patterns of alliances and rivalry. Regardless of these changes, women are invariantly (mis)represented in narratives that are often weaponized against political enemies in ways that foster both ideological and affective political polarization.

‘We hate her... and you too’: polarized intersectionality in Italy throughout changing political scenarios

Introduction

Extant research concerned with growing levels of political conflict within, across and beyond political institutions focuses increasingly on polarization processes by looking at the level at which it occurs (mass, group, or political elites - see Kubin and von Sikorski, 2021) as well as at the ideological or affective logics driving it (Druckman and Levendusky, 2019).

Recent contributions enrich this overall landscape underlining how gender is not solely a variable structuring patterns of polarization (Baldassarri and Gelman, 2008; Ondercin and Lizotte, 2021) but also a highly polarized domain per se especially online where discussions on gender-related issues are characterized by higher rates of digital content production and antagonism (Inguanzo et al., 2021). Thus, studies are multiplying that examine how gender is weaponized within an increasingly polarized digital public discourse (Inara Rodis, 2021). In this respect, the concept of ‘polarized intersectionality’ (Pavan and Martella, 2021) was proposed to grasp the modes in which citizens, media outlets, political parties, and leaders (mis)represent women in the digital public discourse at the intersection of different axes of discrimination (e.g., their gender, ethnic origin, age, class, and religion) with the explicit intent to distinguish themselves from political opponents, attacking them, and dismantling their political visions and strategies.

This paper aims at contributing to this line of inquiry by investigating how the weaponization of women’s representation in online discussions entangles with polarized antagonistic dynamics for how they evolve in a context in which political hostility and collaborations evolve rapidly and fluidly. We do so by exploring two online conversations that unfolded in the Italian Twittersphere and in which two women were put at the center of attention: Carola Rackete, the Captain of Sea Watch 3 who forced her way in the port of Lampedusa to rescue a group of migrants, and Silvia Aisha Romano, an NGO aid-worker kidnapped in Kenya and returned home converted to Islam. Occurring in 2019 and 2020, respectively, the conversations about Rackete and Romano link Italy’s stable high levels of online

3 polarization (Urman, 2020) and systematically below-the-average levels of gender equality (EIGE,
4 2022) with its unique situation of ‘two populisms in power’ (Bordignon, 2020: 20) for which the main
5 populist party – the Five Stars Movement (5SM) – governed the country first allying with the League
6 (the main right-wing party at the time) and then with the Democratic Party (the main party of the center-
7 left area).

14 We argue that looking at these two cases, albeit different amongst themselves and referred to a
15 specific context, provides us with a useful entry point to understand how stereotyping attitudes that are 16 transversal to the ideological spectrum (Pavan and Martella, 2021) and particularly frequent in online
17 conversations (Inguanzo et al., 2021) entwine with fluid political antagonism –with women’s 18 (mis)representations instrumentally crafted and circulated to sanction or, alternatively, defend their 19 “noncompliance” to gender and intersectional social norms (Sobieraj, 2020) and, at the same time, to 20 defy and/or despise former allies and current political adversaries.

28 The paper is organized as follows. In the first section we link extant reflections on political 29 polarization with those on the instrumentalization of gender politics. Second, we discuss the polarizing
30 nature of online discussions that put women at the center of attention and propose to advance reflections
31 in this area by examining dynamics of polarized intersectionality throughout changing political 32 scenarios. We then present our data and methods and illustrate the results of our analysis. Finally, we 33 discuss our results and draw some conclusions.

45 Political polarization has been seen as fed by two analytically distinct and yet substantively linked
46 processes: ideological and affective polarization (Kubin and von Sikorski, 2021). Ideological
47 polarization can be defined as a separation of politics into different ideological fields which can result
48 from two main processes. On the one side, increased ideological distance among political fronts
49 (politicians and parties) (Levendusky, 2010). On the other, a tendency towards opinion alignment that 50 does not necessarily reflect in ideological radicalization (Baldassarri and Gelman, 2008). Both these 51 processes seem to affect citizens by favoring the alignment of their opinions with those of preferred

3 politicians and parties as well as their progressive distancing from other political forces/parties along
4 cleavages that become more and more salient for their social identity.

7 Individuals' identification with a political party/movement is at heart of what has been called 8 'affective polarization' (Druckman and Levendusky, 2019; Iyengar et al., 2012), which occurs when 9 citizens develop a sense of dislike and distrusts against opposing partisans and groups perceived as 10 politically, socially, and culturally distant (West and Iyengar, 2022). Political fractures of this sort and 11 consequent distancing align with other sociodemographic and cultural cleavages based on ethnicity and 12 gender (Mason, 2018) and thus set crucial contributions towards fragmenting society in antagonistic
13 and irreconcilable groups. Consistently, in a recent study, McCoy et al. (2018) define polarization as a 14 'process whereby the normal multiplicity of differences in a society increasingly aligns along a single 15 dimension, cross-cutting differences become instead reinforcing, and people increasingly perceive and 16 describe politics and society in terms of "Us" versus "Them"' (p. 35). What the authors envision is 17 therefore a progressive shifting from ideological to affective polarization throughout new and multiple
18 cleavages that support the construction of a social identity often in conflict with distant and unacceptable
19 'others'.

35 As polarization processes increasingly pivot around social and individual identities (West and 36 Iyengar, 2022), they tend to grow their roots and, at the same time, harden conflicts over gender-related
37 issues. Particularly in contexts in which de-democratization trends are boosted by the electoral success
38 of nationalist and populist parties (Ferree, 2021; Graff and Korolczuk, 2022), opposition to gender and 39 sexual equality fuels polarization as conservative gendered social orders are frequently reclaimed 'to 40 delegitimize political opponents, liberal pundits, and civil society leaders as corrupt elites' (Graff and 41 Korolczuk, 2022: 7). In turn, this instrumentalization ushers the subordination of gender politics to 42 higher-level endeavors of constructing antithetical political identities and paves the way to the 43 reproduction of systems of interlocked inequalities insofar as oppressive systems of gender relations
44 intersect exclusionary 'othering strategies' (Donà, 2021) that deeply ground within discriminatory
45 visions of race, ethnicity, religion, age, and physical ability.

57
58 Moreover, extant literature suggests that political elites and media also play a key role by in 59 welding polarized political conflict and instrumental uses of gender. Indeed, leaders and political elites

3 are often taken as a point of reference for tracing the contours of the ‘others’ (Druckman and
5 Levendusky, 2019) as they come to subsume all the hated and disliked characteristics that are associated
7 with alterity. In this context, the ‘performance of gender’ becomes crucial for the construction of 8
9 otherness as it comes to subsume the bulk of the collective values held by candidates and their respective 10
11 parties (Ferree, 2021; Utych, 2021). Relatedly, studies show that, especially online, affective 12
13 polarization often pivots around prominent individuals (be they party leaders, celebrities, or renown
14
15 public figures) and that conversations’ tones become much harsher when women (particularly those 16
17 with a public profile) are the main objects of attention (Harmer and Southern, 2021; Ward and 18
19 McLoughlin, 2020).

20
21
22 In parallel, media actively foster both ideological and affective polarization by adopting 23
24 narrative styles and frames that contribute to the identification of ‘enemies’ (Robison and Mullinix, 25
26 2016). Consistently, media selection and exposure have been found to be opinion self-reinforcing acts
27
28 that further political polarization and intolerance towards adversaries (Dvir-Gvirsman, 2017). In this 29
30 respect, observers highlight that women stereotyped and biased representation are crucial in fostering 31
32 partisanship and, thus, political antagonism. On the one hand, mediated representations of gender are 33
34 crucial for sustaining identity politics as the portrayal especially of women politicians tend to ‘reflect 35
36 hegemonic discourses of identity politics that [...] are often used to construct inclusionary/exclusionary
37
38 boundaries that differentiate between self and other’ (Fiig, 2010: 47). On the other hand, media
39
40 stereotyped representations of women cement sexist beliefs and attitudes both in women and men
41
42 (Swami et al., 2010; Ward, 2016)(Swami et al., 2010; Ward, 2016) which in turn have been connected
43
44 with strongly polarized patterns political participation both offline (Utych, 2021) and online (Inguanzo
45
46 et al., 2021).

51 Fighting about and through gender in online spaces

52
53
54 Against this background, a growing number of studies focus on the divisiveness of digital 55
56 conversations centered on women and gender-related issues. Sexist messages online are found to be
57
58 ‘strategic in nature’ as they foster the polarization of social identities along a normative cleavage
59
60 between acceptable and unacceptable gender behaviors which, in turn, builds on traditional beliefs and

3 provides solid ground to enforce stereotypes and, hence, antagonism against nonconformant women
5 (Felmlee et al., 2020: 17).

7 Stereotypes against which women are evaluated tend to mirror biased representation of female
8
9 bodies, relationships and morality in the media and function as a device to denigrate their capabilities
10
11 and courses of action (Felmlee et al., 2020; Harmer and Southern, 2021; Swami et al., 2010). In this 12
13 respect, an intersectional lens brings focus squarely to the exclusionary and anti-democratic 14
15 potentialities of stereotypical representations that make a simultaneous use of gendered, racialized,
16
17 homophobic and Islamophobic imaginaries particularly to support nationalist, sovereigntist, and 18
19 conservative political programs (Olufemi, 2020). Indeed, extant studies show how stereotypical 20
21 misrepresentations are weaponized online even more harshly and frequently against women from 22
23 minority groups (Inara Rodis, 2021; Sobieraj, 2020) targeting multiple aspects of their identities – for 24
25 example, coupling misogyny with Islamophobia or racism (Harmer and Southern, 2021) – and thus 26
27 reinforcing intersectional patterns of social exclusion (Felmlee et al., 2020). Women’s age and 28
29 experience constitute other two important axes of intersectional discrimination so that, for example, in 30
31 several countries younger representative of minority groups when first elected are more abused online
32
33 than others (Ward and McLoughlin, 2020).

34
35
36 Although traditionalists become highly vocal and overrepresented on social media (Inguanzo
37
38 et al., 2021), they often encounter the reactions of counter publics that engage with and fight
39
40 intersectional misrepresentations (Inara Rodis, 2021) by incrementing the production of opposing 41
42 contents (Inguanzo et al., 2021) and thus avoiding the individualization and the silencing of 43
44 discriminated targets (Eschmann, 2021). In this sense, online discussions triggered by or filled with 45
46 intersectional (mis)representations take a highly polarized shape insofar as participants endorse and 47
48 defend antagonistic visions of gendered social orders that are often articulated along a division between 49
50 ‘Us’ and ‘Them’ that is typical of populist rhetoric (Donà, 2021; Martella and Bracciale, 2021).

51
52
53 Recent contributions underline how online conflicts pivoting around contrasting visions of 54
55 gender mix with political polarization dynamics. In this respect, the concept of ‘polarized
56
57 intersectionality’ (Pavan and Martella 2021: 382) has been proposed to grasp ‘the strategic tailoring of 58
59 women’s intersectionalrepresentations’ are crafted to attack and delegitimize political enemies
60

3 in a context in which digital media constitute pivotal polarized political spaces (Urman, 2020; Yarchi
4 et al., 2021). To be sure, levels and repertoires of stereotypization and misogyny vary across partisan
5 groups as they mirror and, at the same time, contribute to nurture antagonistic gendered social orders
6 and imaginaries. At the same time, women's (mis)representations online are often embedded in 7 narratives that enclose direct attacks against political counterparts through which in-groups' boundaries
8 and identities are strengthened, unbridgeable distances from adversaries are marked and attempts to 9 dismantle unacceptable political visions and strategies are made (Pavan and Martella, 2021).

12
13
14

16
17
18 However, extant analyses remain quite static insofar as the weaponization of women's 19 (mis)representations is typically observed in a specific moment in time and with respect to context-
20 specific adversarial arrangements. In fact, investigations of digital dynamics do recognize the fluidity 21 not only of identity processes and practices that foster increased polarization (Mason, 2018) but also of 22 online conversational environments, wherein changing patterns of attention-giving and content
23 circulation unfold along a 'multipolar schism' which reflects identity and values-based fragmentations
24 (Bodrunova et al., 2019) while enhancing those 'mechanisms of dehumanization, depersonalization,
25 and stereotyping' that are proper of affective polarization (McCoy et al., 2018).

35 Building on these studies, our aim is to examine how polarized intersectionality dynamics vary
36 within changing political scenarios and how they entwine with both ideological and affective political 37 polarization dynamics that occur when parties, leaders and, more in general, partisan communities
38 swing in-between relationships of political collaboration and hostility. Accordingly, our study addresses
39 the following research questions:

40
41
42
43
44
45 RQ1. Do changing political scenarios translate in different conversational and ideologically
46 characterized environments?

47
48
49 RQ2. What type of intersectional (mis)representations emerge in these conversations?

50
51
52 RQ3. What type of antagonism do women's (mis)representation fuel and, eventually, in what ways do
53 they contribute to polarization processes?

Data and methods

To answer our research questions, we compared two online discussions that occurred in Italy between 2019 and 2020 and explicitly focus on two women who suddenly raised to public attention. The first case refers to Carola Rackete, the Captain of Sea Watch 3, who forced her way into the port of Lampedusa on 26 June 2019 to rescue migrants' lives. The second case concerns the release on 9 May 2020 of Silvia Aisha Romano, an NGO aid-worker kidnapped in Kenya and returned home converted to Islam.

Massive attention towards these two women was mainly motivated by the fact that their experiences resulted to be challenging in several respects. Rackete's choice to dock in Lampedusa against the orders of the Italian government (and, more particularly, of the back-then Minister of Interior Matteo Salvini) evidently disrupted the 'classic feminine personality stereotype' based on warmth, niceness, and lack of competence (Felmlee et al., 2020: 18). Similarly, Romano's choice to convert to Islam openly challenged stereotypes of Muslim women as subjugated and deprived of their autonomy while, at the same time, putting in question the privilege of white Christian women (Olufemi, 2020). Moreover, with their actions, both women challenged diffused populist arguments on migrants as a 'threat': directly helping them (Rackete) and choosing 'their' religion (Romano) the two women took a rather clear position with respect to a highly polarizing issue for Western countries (Martella and Bracciale, 2021; McCoy et al., 2018).

Interestingly, Rackete and Romano's challenging behaviors and, therefore, the discussion they triggered, occurred in two divergent political scenarios. Rackete indeed docked in Lampedusa in July 2019 disobeying to the orders of a government jointly led by the right-wing League and the populist Five Stars Movement (5SM) and opposed by the left-wing Democratic Party (DP). Only few months after, in May 2020, Romano's release and conversion became a matter of public discussion while the government was jointly led by the DP and the 5SM, with the League sitting instead at the opposition.

We choose to monitor these two conversations on Twitter due to its importance for political and media elites in the Italian hybrid media system (Bracciale and Cepernich, 2018) and cuing on widespread recognition of its polarizing effect (Yarchi et al., 2021). Tweets were downloaded via the full archive search API for academic research¹:

- CarolaRackete OR Carola Rackete OR Rackete from 25 June 2019 to 2 July 2019;
- SilviaRomano OR Silvia Romano OR Aisha from 9 May 2020 to 17 May 2020.

In total we collected 9,576 original tweets including Carola Rackete keywords which originated an overall volume of 188,690 retweets, and 17,142 original tweets including Silvia Aisha Romano keywords which in turn originated an overall volume of 264,367 retweets. In our analysis, we focused exclusively on retweet actions as they emerge in literature as the clearest cue of polarized communities on Twitter (Conover et al., 2011).

Following previous works (Pavan and Martella, 2021), we constructed a unimodal weighted network in which tweets are linked if they were retweeted by the same user(s). To identify main semantic areas within these structures, we employed the Clauset et al. algorithm (2004) and broke the giant components into communities.² To further assess actual levels of disconnection between network areas, we compared densities within and between communities (Borgatti et al., 2013) and considered as separated those with internal and intra-community density levels, respectively, higher and lower than the giant component's value.

We derived the overall political leaning of these semantic communities starting from the presence of tweets authored by political parties, Italian and European parliamentary members, leaders, and media accounts that are main providers of cues for ideological and affective polarization (Druckman and Levendusky, 2019; Dvir-Gvirsman, 2017). We then analyzed texts within each community through Top2Vec technique (Angelov, 2020), a topic modeling based on sentence embeddings³ and density clustering (Hdbscan), to identify the different topics feeding the discussions within each community.

Following Yarchi et al. (2020) we removed inconsistent topics to then classify remaining ones manually with respect to two dimensions that intertwine the different position-taking and actions in a polarized debate with the category of gender:

i) The main subject targeted in the topic, distinguishing:

- the two women (Carola Rackete and Silvia Romano);
- political elites (distinguishing among government, leaders, actors, and parties);

- 3 ● media;
- 4
- 5 ● institutions (i.e. judiciary, President of the Republic, Italian Finance Police, etc.);
- 7 ● political communities ('them' as political opponents, i.e. right or left-wingers, 'leghisti',
- 8 'piddini', etc.);
- 9
- 10
- 11 ● others ('them' as other groups, i.e. immigrants, haters, NGO's, etc.).
- 12

14 ii) the main aim in the topic, distinguishing between:

- 15 ● news report, distinguishing if the report is generally neutral (N), positive (POS) or negative
- 16 (NEG);
- 17
- 18 ● support, when the subject(s) of the topics are supported or endorsed;
- 19
- 20 ● defense, when the subject(s) of the topics are defended or protected;
- 21
- 22 ● attack, when the subject(s) of the topics are criticized or disapproved;
- 23
- 24 ● discredit, when the subject(s) of the topics are belittled or discredited.
- 25
- 26
- 27

28 To reach a perfect agreement on topic labels, subject and aim categories, the team held several 29 independent coding sessions and regular comparison meetings (Neuendorf, 2019).

30
 31
 32 Following extant approaches (Bodrunova et al., 2019; Conover et al., 2011) we identified 33 polarization based on both network properties (clustering structure and ideological leaning) and 34 attitudes expressed in texts by identified communities. Consequently, to understand how women 35 (mis)representations entangle with ideological and affective polarization, we interpreted specific 36 combinations of aims and targets (e.g., discredit or explicit attacks on political communities) as a sign
 37 of political animosity toward the outgroup and thus as a contribution to affective polarization (Iyengar 38 et al., 2012; Kubin and von Sikorski, 2021). Similarly, we considered attacks and discredit towards 39 political actors such as leaders, parties, members, and government as a cue of increased ideological
 40 distance among political fronts or alignment to one's party's position (Baldassarri and Gelman, 2008; 41 Kubin and von Sikorski, 2021). We then examined qualitatively women's (mis)representations looking 42 at topics grouped by aims.

Results

Semantic communities and their alignment with political alliances

The two unimodal networks show the presence of a giant component including more than 90% of the nodes (Rackete: 93.5%; Romano: 93.4%). The community finding algorithm identified two main communities within the Rackete's semantic network and three in the Romano's one (table 1). Values of the density study show that communities in figure 1 are well separated regardless of the intensity of the relationships among nodes. Ultimately, these communities of tweets constitute independent corpora that can be explored individually (table A1 in appendix).

Table 1. Network Overall and Community Measures

	Carola Rackete Semantic Network	Silvia Aisha Romano Semantic Network
Nodes (N)	9,576	17,142
Edges (N)	854,383	1,855,780
Nodes in giant component (n)	8,957	16,006
Edges weight mean	2.4	1.9
Community 1 nodes (n)	2,928	4,527
Community 2 nodes (n)	5,629	8,255
Community 3 nodes (n)	-	1,930

[insert Figure 1 a and 1 b]

To identify the political leaning of each community we analyzed the distribution of media and politics tweets (including leaders, Italian and European parliamentary members, and relevant politicians and groups who run in the 2018 general elections). As shown in table A2 (appendix), the two semantic communities in the Carola Rackete network are neatly ideologically connotated. Indeed, while the first one includes tweets by right wing parties and their preferred media outlets⁴ (i.e. Libero, La Verità, il Giornale and Mediaset Tgcom 24), the second one contains tweets by left-wing parties and close media outlets (i.e. la Repubblica, il Corriere della Sera, il Manifesto, Tg3, etc.). Almost all tweets by members of the 5SM and their favorites media outlets (i.e. Tg La7 and il Fatto Quotidiano) belong to the first

3 community thus reflecting the party's alliance with the League in the 'yellow-green' government in
5 place at that time.

7 Similarly, the first and the second communities in the discussion about Romano are 8
9 ideologically oriented to the right (C1) and to the left (C2) along with their preferred media outlets
10
11 (table A3 appendix). However, here a third community emerges that contains tweets by 5SM members
12
13 and close media (il Fatto Quotidiano, il Fatto Blog, etc.). Also in this case, the overall community
14
15 structure reflects that of the governmental coalition in place in 2020 (the 'yellow-red' government
16
17 formed by left-wing parties and the 5SM). Still, the correspondence here is less neat as the 5SM
18
19 community 'stands in between' separating from that of its former political ally yet without fully merging
20
21 with the left-oriented one.
22
23

24 Neat of this discrepancy, several elements suggest that changes in government alliances do in 25
26 fact translate in different conversational and ideologically characterized environments (RQ1). Indeed,
27
28 the changed geometry of the governmental coalition from the Rackete to the Romano case seems to 29
30 have increased the ideological distance (Levendusky, 2010) between users who retweeted 5SM and 31
32 right-wing contents, as shown by the shift from a bipolar to a tripolar network in which users retweet
33
34 political actors and media messages based on specific ideological leanings. In other words, while in the 35
36 Rackete case users of Community 1 retweeted both center-right and 5SM accounts (as the League and 37
38 the 5SM were allied in governing the country), in the Romano case this 'communality of sources'
39
40 disappears almost entirely and two separate communities of tweets emerge in connection to the cracking
41
42 of the 'yellow-green' alliance. Moreover, the League-5SM government fell few weeks after Rackete's
43
44 case, and its precariousness mirrors in the scarce presence of tweets by 5SM in the first online
45
46 conversation compared to its livelier activity in the debate on Romano when the 5SM was enjoying 47
48 renewed strength as a governmental force.

Subjects and aims of topics in the conversation

The conversation about Carola Rackete

With respect to the (mis)representations that emerged in the conversation about Carola Rackete (RQ2), it is possible to notice that the right-wing leaning community (C1, table 2) is strongly engaged in the effort of attacking and discrediting the captain along with other subjects (specifically, migrants, NGOs, and pro-migrants elites, C1 topics 12⁵, 13⁶, 17⁷) and institutions (mainly attorneys and the broader judiciary system, C1 topic 3⁸). When attacked, Rackete is framed through a wide repertoire of stereotypes that focus on her aspect, ‘dubious’ morality, distance from idealized visions of femininity and civil citizenship, and are flanked by incursions into her private life. Rackete’s bold stand ‘in a male dominated space’ (Sobieraj 2020: 10) like the Italian political scene is sanctioned by depicting her as a criminal who is breaking Italian laws, does not respect Italian institutions, is smuggling immigrants in the country and, therefore, deserves tough sanctions (C1 topic 2). Interestingly, attempts to discredit her take neat gendered and intersectional connotations, as Rackete’s gender is insistently stressed through the label ‘capitana’ –a clearly gendered connotation to stress her alterity to the ‘normal’ figure of a male ship captain– and she is narrated as a ‘liar’⁹, a ‘bull’¹⁰, a ‘Miss’ (see endnote 5), in cahoots with pro-immigration elites, who is abundantly paid by NGOs (C1 topic 13), or as the white, rich, rasta, and bored¹¹ daughter of a former officer who trades weapons (hence, a hypocrite, C1 topic 10¹²).

At the same time, attacks against Rackete are launched instrumentally from the right-wing leaning community seeking to exacerbate levels of ideological polarization, particularly by discrediting political actors that support her (RQ3). Indeed, although there are no explicit attacks or attempts to discredit political outgroups – a typical trait of affective polarization (West and Iyengar, 2022) – Community 1 tweets mention Rackete in the context of what are in fact direct attacks against institutions, particularly the judicial system which did not convict her (C1 topics 6¹³ and 19¹⁴), and the Democratic Party, whose members jumped on board of the SeaWatch 3 and are therefore accuse to be ‘traitors’ (to the homeland) disobeying the orders of the Interior Minister Matteo Salvini (C1 topics 4¹⁵, 7,18¹⁶)

Tweets in the left-wing community (C2) instead mention Rackete in two main ways: on the one hand, showing explicit support for the captain and her actions (C2 topics 1, 2, 3, 8, 12, 13, 14, 16, 18, 19, 25, 29, 32, 33, and 39); on the other, to discredit or criticize Matteo Salvini (C2 topics 0, 5, 15, 28, 31). While most topics reveal different facets of this support (pleas for sustaining economically SeaWatch and her legal expenses, moral support on ‘having done the right thing’, etc.), in several cases Rackete is almost glorified, and her courage¹⁷, determination, intelligence and skills as captain (in this community, often used in a male connotation) are paraded and, sometimes, directly contrasted with the slimness of the profile of the ‘captain’ of the League, Matteo Salvini, who is instead accused of not knowing how to be a minister¹⁸, of having fled from prosecution (unlike Rackete who faces willingly the consequences of her acts)¹⁹, or who is mocked after the decision of the Agrigento attorney to not validate Rackete’s arrest²⁰. Flanking targeted attacks against Salvini are those against broadly identified ‘haters’ (C2 topics 4, 17, 22, and 27) - although a slight juxtaposition to ‘right wingers’ (and hence some traces of affective polarization, i.e., C2 topic 10²¹) sometimes appears. Here, it is worth noticing that both offline²² and online²³, Rackete was the subject of sexist and violent hate speech, such as wishing her to be raped²⁴, which in turn generated numerous outraged reactions, sometime stumbling into body shaming²⁵.

Overall, a twofold pattern seems to emerge from tweets of the left-wing leaning community. On the one hand, the production of a hyper-positive and supportive narrative about Rackete configures, as outlined by previous studies (Inara Rodis 2021), as a direct counteraction to attacks she received. On the other hand, however, her frequent comparison with ‘the captain of the right’ Matteo Salvini suggests that this restorative strategy enmeshes with an instrumental use of her greatness and courage (RQ2) particularly to mark ideological differences with the opposed political community and to belittle its leader, the Minister of Interior (RQ3).

The conversation about Silvia Aisha Romano

The (mis)representation of Silvia Aisha Romano (RQ2) crafted by the right-wing community (C1, table 3) clearly pivots around her religious conversion. Indeed, joint attacks to Romano and other actors (particularly, 'Islamists', C1 topics 8, 16, 20, 23, 25, 45) or exclusively against her for having converted to Islam and Al Shabaab²⁶, but also for her wearing a jilbab²⁷ and for meaning to return to Africa²⁸ (C1 topics 1, 16, 20, 23, 24, 28, 32, 42) amount almost to 20% of all direct attacks. While not being the only

3 target (Community 1 tweets also attack ‘the left’ for supporting the aid-worker - see C1 topics 30 and 4
5 47), the ‘converted’ Romano is nonetheless the subject of the largest portion of discrediting tweets. Not
7 only her conversion is equated with a direct endorsement of Islamist terrorism. Her gender and age are 8
9 also recalled to doubt the intentionality of her choice: victim of her kidnappers, young, and naive²⁹, she 10
11 was plagiarized and forced to convert³⁰, to dress like an oppressed Muslim woman³¹, and to become ‘a 12
13 friend’ of Islamic terrorists who were abusing her while she thought they were treating her well³².
14
15 Ultimately, Romano is intersectionally (mis)represented as an ‘unable traitor’ who thinks has made
16
17 a free choice but, in fact, does not realize she has been forced to choose Islam over her Italian and 18
19 Christian roots.

20
21
22 Evident traces of the changed political scenario (RQ1) can be found here by looking at the 23
24 higher percentage of tweets that in this community attack or discredit the Italian government. Pivoting
25
26 around political parties now at the opposition of the ‘yellow-red’ government, tweets in Community 1
27
28 mention Romano in a completely instrumental way, in fact blaming the government for having paid
29
30 millions of euros for her ransom³³ and, consequently, for financing the Islamist jihad³⁴ (C1 topics 0, 3, 31
32 9, 21, 40). Similarly, Romano becomes the excuse to criticize individual party members and the 33
34 mainstream media, accused of diffusing false information on her rescue³⁵. Paralleling diffused attempts 35
36 to mark distances from Romano, her choices, and a government colluded with Islamic terrorists, tweets
37
38 in Community 1 also support, albeit with much less intensity, its political leader Matteo Salvini, by 39
40 reporting insistently his statements on the rescue (C1 topic 14). Consistently with what has emerged
41
42 from previous studies (Pavan and Martella, 2021), the intersectional delegitimization of Romano is 43
44 strategically weaponized by tweets in C1 against the political enemies and, more particularly, to flag an 45
46 ideological distance with the ‘yellow-red’ government (RQ3).

47
48
49 Within the left-wing leaning community (C2), now part of the government coalition, the public
50
51 defense of Romano’s choice to convert to Islam is the main ‘positive’ act performed through tweets
52
53 (10.3% of tweets in the community, C2 topics 3 and 12). While direct support for her and her choices
54
55 is minimal with respect to that expressed for Rackete (5,8% against 32,8%), her public defense passes
56
57 through claims of her freedom to choose her religion or, at least, not to be criticized in light of the 58
59 experience she went through³⁶. However, her freedom of choice is not always framed as an absolute 60

3 right but, rather, as something that should not be criticized in light of the hypocritical ‘conversion’ of 4 voters from the South of Italy to the League³⁷ or of the past ‘sympathy’ that the fascist regime expressed
6 towards Islam.

9 More relevant appears to be instead the tendency to mention Romano to defy political 10 adversaries (RQ3). In this case, attack tweets are as frequent as in C1 (both with respect to the 11 community and total tweets) but much more concentrated on two targets: generic haters³⁸ and individual 12 party members - especially Alessandro Pagano³⁹ and Nico Basso⁴⁰ - two members of the League who,
13 respectively, defined Romano a ‘neo terrorist’ and asked to ‘hang’ her (C2 topics 6 and 22). At the same
14 time, targets of discredit in this community become more specific: while tweets in Community 2
15 continue to attack Matteo Salvini⁴¹, aversion is overwhelmingly directed against members of the 16 opposed political community (labeled as ‘leghisti’, ‘fascioleghisti’⁴² right-wingers) and their 17 newspapers⁴³ (C2 topics 7, 11, and 16).
18
19
20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27

28 Similar trends characterize the public recount of Romano in the third community formed by 29 tweets of the 5SM and its supporters where she is recalled mostly to perform two equally relevant 30 functions. On the one hand, to report the news of her rescue (C3 topics 0, 6, 7, 8) and, considering that 31 the 5SM was chairing the Ministry of Foreign affairs, almost always in a positive way (although some 32 doubts emerge about the ransom payment and Romano's conversion⁴⁴, C3 topics 1, 9, and 11). On the 33 other hand, almost half tweets attack, in order: generic 'haters' (C3 topics 2, 5, 10), opposed partisans
34 (particularly, League's supporters, C3 topics 3 and 4) and, along the same lines as Community 2,
35 individual party members of the League who publicly attacked Romano⁴⁵. At the same time,
36 Community #3 shows more doubts than the previous one especially about Romano's conversion, which 37 is often seen as a result of imprisonment rather than a free choice.
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48

49 Ultimately, the two communities joined in the ‘yellow-red’ government activate to contrast
50 digital gendered and Islamophobic attacks against Romano thus confirming once more that increased 51 production of oppositional content is a common counteraction strategy against sexism, racism and 52 gender-based hostility (Eschmann, 2021; Inguanzo et al., 2021). However, the defense of Romano is 53 somehow clouded by two elements. First, her (mis)representation as a young and naive woman, which 54 feeds doubts on the intentionality of her conversion (RQ2). Second, the high amount of mentions she 55
56
57
58
59
60 receives in what appears to be a conversation predominantly ruled by mechanisms of affective polarization, where nothing is systematically said to reclaim her freedom of choice and tweets are instead mainly aimed at discrediting political opponents from the right and their supporters (RQ3).

Discussion and conclusion

In this paper we investigated the interplay between women (mis)representations within digital discussions and political polarization dynamics in the context of evolving political scenarios. We examined two cases which, albeit different and referred to a specific context, allowed us to better disentangle how stereotyping and sexist attitudes and political antagonism entwine. Our exploration was guided by three main research questions: first, whether different political arrangements and alliances mirror within online discussions, and generate different conversational and ideological environments; second, what types of (mis)representations emerge in these contexts; and, third, how these (mis)representations are put at the service of political antagonism feeding processes of both ideological and affective polarization.

With respect to our first concern (RQ1), our results seem to confirm previous studies (Bodrunova et al., 2019) that highlight how communication and attention flows online tend to reproduce offline polarized political settings. The shift from a bipolar to a tripolar system in our semantic networks reflects the changing Italian political scenario, with the conversation about Rackete unfolding in between two main semantic communities (one gathering the tweets of the government alliance between the League and the 5SM and the other gathering messages from the left-wing opposition); and the one about Romano taking place in a different setting where the new alliance between the 5SM and the Democratic Party emerges albeit more at the semantic than at the structural level. In this sense, our reconstruction of the two online discussions reflects the difficulties of re-arranging and align political identities of actors that swing between relationships of political collaboration and hostility.

3 Our study also confirms previous insights on how online discussions that center on women,
4 their bodies and choices are highly polarized and filled with attacks, hostility, and a wide range of 5 intersectionally stereotyped (mis)representations (Harmer and Southern, 2021; Inguanzo et al., 2021;
6 Ward and McLoughlin, 2020). At the same time, it better clarifies this point showing that conflict
7 remains high regardless of variations in the patterns of alliance and government arrangements and 8 invariably unfolds at the crossroads between two main dimensions: one pertaining to opposed gender 9 norms endorsed by political actors; and the other tied to political hostility, ideological distance, and 10 affective dislike for political adversaries.

11
12 More specifically, looking at the dynamics of (mis)representations of both Rackete and Romano
13 (RQ2), we can notice that the clashing of divergent visions of gender follows a pattern that remains
14 constant: right-wing political actors and partisan communities always elaborate and circulate ferocious
15 intersectional (mis)representations about women who are accused to embody noncompliant gender
16 models and behaviors; while more left-wing leaning parties and their supporters respond to these attacks
17 coalescing within ‘defending counterpublics’ that aim at opposing intersectional discrimination
18 (Inguanzo et al., 2021; Ward and McLoughlin, 2020).

19
20 Mixing strategically biased visions of gender, age, class, geographical provenance and religious 21 choices, the two women are publicly narrated by tweets in the right-wing communities as ‘unattractive’
22 because their physical appearance does not adhere to feminine stereotypes (Felmlee et al., 2020; Swami 23 et al., 2010), as incapable because of their age (Ward and McLoughlin, 2020), as immoral because of 24 their private lives (as shown for example, by allegations focused on Romano’s alleged sexual 25 relationships with the ‘enemies’ or on Rackete’s father) or because of their alleged association with 26 immigration and terrorism (Harmer and Southern, 2021). Overall, intersectional (mis)representation of 27 the two women are carefully crafted to denounce and sanction their extraneousness with respect to the 28 conservative and Islamophobic social order envisaged by right-wing political actors and their 29 supporters.

30
31 However, our results also suggest that, contrary to what emerges from existing accounts
32 (Inguanzo et al., 2021), responses to these attacks do not necessarily entail the correction of biased and 33 stereotyped representations and the public circulation of fairer and more empowering narratives. In both

3 conversations, communities that respond to the attacks coming from the right-wing do so by resorting
4 to other stereotypes which are at times used to ‘justify’ the choices of the two women and other times
5 to explicitly attack political opponents. In this sense, the narratives constructed by left-wing leaning
6 communities in both discussions and, albeit to a lesser extent, by the 5SM in the Romano case can do
7 little, if anything at all, to dismantle the stereotyped, oppressive, and mortifying representations pushed
8 forward by more conservative ideologies. Often, more than being concerned with reversing the narrative
9 on the two women, responses to intersectional (mis)representations seem to be aimed at defying political 10 opponents, as shown for example by the persistence of doubts on Romano’s conversion especially in 11 the 5SM community that accompany attacks to its former political allies.

14 Controversies about Rackete and Romano speaks even more loudly to the instrumental use that 15 all actors and partisan communities make of the two women. By examining the type of polarization that 16 are fed by intersectional (mis)representations (RQ3), our study shows that in fact both ideological and 17 affective distancing do increasingly align with cultural cleavages such as ethnicity and gender (Mason, 18 2018), and thus highlights the importance of intersectional aspects in the construction of ‘political 19 otherness’ in an increasingly polarized context.

22 In both conversations, all communities of tweets weaponize Rackete and Romano against 23 political adversaries and government actors in a way that contributes to rise general levels of ideological
24 and affective polarization. Indeed, in the conversation about Rackete, intersectional 25 (mis)representations are used by the right-wing community not only to discredit the captain but also 26 members of the Democratic Party who show her support; and a similar instrumental use of Rackete is
27 made by the left-wing community, which celebrates her greatness with the intention to belittle Matteo
28 Salvini. Similarly, Romano's conversion and physical appearance function particularly for the right-
29 wing community as intersectional devices to exacerbate ideological opposition against the government
30 led by the 5SM and the Democratic Party for its unacceptable choice of paying for her ransom.

31
32
33 Importantly, the noncompliance of the two women and their action are taken as a starting point
34 in both discussions to directly attack and discredit adversaries and to showcase growing hostility against 35 rival communities perceived as politically, socially, and culturally distant (West and Iyengar, 2022) and 36 are often reduced to their individual members or leaders (Druckman and Levendusky, 2019). Still, levels

3 of affective polarization appear to be higher in the conversation about Romano in connection with the 4 increased ideological distance s between the 5SM and the League, and their reversed government role
5 (which bring the latter to attack the ‘yellow-red’ government and the former to defend it); but also with 6 the consonance between the centrality of Islamophobia for actors on the center-right of the ideological
7 spectrum and Romano’s noncompliance. Indeed, responses to attacks against Romano resort to harsher
8 tones and display a more precise association between extraneous ‘others’ that have to be alienated
9 (McCoy et al., 2018) and specific political parties and areas - as shown by the shift from attacks against
10 generic ‘haters’, more prevalent in the Rackete debate, to the punctual identification of enemies
11 primarily with ‘leghisti’, ‘fascists’, ‘sovereignist’, and ‘right-wingers’. Interestingly, our results show 12 that affective polarization is mainly generated in communities that activate to counter the biased and 13 stereotyped representation of women, thus clarifying that in highly polarized context sexist, racist and 14 Islamophobic attacks continue to be collectively checked and challenged (Eschmann, 2021; Inguanzo 15 et al., 2021) but in fact could generate a different sort of ‘othering’ strategy centered on political 16 incompatibility.

18 In conclusion, our study indicates that attitudes towards intersectionally (mis)represent women
19 and political polarization not only interact but, in fact, mutually reinforce. This trend does not seem to 20 depend on specific arrangement of political alliances which, nonetheless, provide political actors with 21 a map to orient their attacks. Trapped in between (mis)representations that are either crafted to reclaim 22 conservative and oppressive gendered orders or to attack political adversaries, women and their
23 experiences are instrumentally re-written when not directly silenced. Empty expressions of support
24 which do not address the substance of intersectional discrimination, even when produced in big
25 quantities, prove to be only a weak response to hyper-vocal intersectional hostility, which is instead
26 better dealt with by stressing ideological distance and augmenting overt expressions of dislike, distrust,
27 and refusal against political enemies. Crucially, our study show that this is not only a strategy put in 28 place by actors who aim at restoring the gendered social orders that women like Rackete and Romano
29 have breached with their courageous choices. More relevantly, it shows that it is the most common
30 strategy enacted by those who wish to counter mechanism of social exclusion but, in fact, end up 31 discursively producing new ones.
